HE struggle had now lasted for over three hours. The Limerick Lad continued to come gamely to the scratch, although unable to see his opponent. Both glims were in mourning and the DYER DEFEATS STEARNS stream from his beezer, which was so completely flattened as to be indistinguishable. He had spit out his front teeth and his lips were so battered that he could only mumble and shake his head when his backer, Sir John, asked if he had not had enough and offered to forfelt the stakes. The Piper was in hardly better case. He had one lamp open, so that he could still see, but, with both mauleys broken, was unable to strike a finishing blow. In the sixty-seventh round the Piper caught the Limerick champion around the neck and, throwing him with a cross-buttock, fell upon him so heav-

The greatest change is in the character of the men who take part in boxing contests. Years ago a prizetighter was a professional brute, known and shunned by respectable people. To-day a ring champion is looked upon as a successful athlete, and received in any company. This looked upon as a successful athlete, and received in any company. This is particularly true in Australia, where the professional boxer is classed with the greatest amateur cricketers and tennis and football players, and respected accordingly.
